Schooling the World asks, "If you wanted to change a culture in a single generation, how would you do it?" The response is, "You would change the way it educates its children." It's an idea this event fosters. The focus is on building a brighter future through the improved treatment of children and youth.

People described as cultural creatives are reshaping our lives. They are the students who opt-out of school, the innovative educators who are striving to bring about needed change, the parents who are demonstrating the value of unschooling, the psychologists promoting the importance of play, the environmentalists urging us to preserve and enjoy the outdoors, the social workers supporting mental health, the politicians championing human rights, and the list goes on.

The event is a time to network, a time to consider the potential of collective action. Come to talk about what you are doing and what matters to you. Bring cards with your contact information to share for follow-up.

By coming together we can produce a collective action that is greater than the sum of our individual efforts. Plan to attend and to bring along others with visions of a promising future.
